From the New York Atlas.
THE POWER OF LOVE.

It is a dark, cold, dreary night in the city—The lamps burn dimly, or are nearly out as is often the case when their light is most needed. The church clocks have struck the hour of twelve and the streets are quite deserted, with the exception of here and there a straggler hurrying homeward. The lead colored clouds hang low, and moist and mucky, while a fog is driving inland from the bay, so dense that objects are scarcely discernible across the street.

Every place of business is closed in the city, with the exception of drinking saloons, and dens where the vilest poisons are dealt out to every one who calls and has the money to pay; and these, even at this late hour, are filled with men in all conditions of life, and in every phase of drunkenness. What a strange creature surely is man, for of all the animals ever created, he is the only one that voluntarily takes into his stomach that which he knows will injure him, and may crush all his prospects in life. He must have a sad consciousness of his own, who would sell, and sell, and sell again, his poisonous alcohol to men already drunk, and whom he at the same time knows have wives to support and children to educate.

A few minutes after midnight, a man was seen to issue from a public house in the vicinity of the Park, and turn his steps up town, through Broadway. It is so dark we can scarcely designate his person, but one thing is very palpable—he is not exactly in that condition which becomes a gentleman. He swings, as he passes along, from the right to the left, and sometimes stumbles forward as though he would fall down were it not that some good angel, who yet has hope and patience, condescends to watch over and protect him.

Hark! he mutters as he goes along—for drunken men will always talk to themselves, and of themselves, and not always complimentary either. Something has vexed him, for he seems to be in a furious passion, and swears terribly. What has happened? Perhaps he will tell himself—let us listen?

"What a fool!—what a cursed fool! It is nothing but rum, rum, and drink, drink from morning till night, from night till morning!—Wretch, fool, idiot! Not fit to live—what shall I do?—oh, God, what shall I do? Die!—that is the best thing I can do! Suppose I do die? Who would miss me? I wonder if it is hard to drown? It cannot take long, and will soon be over; but then, I'm afraid—I never think of that without seeing my mother as she last stood before me to bid me good bye. Why, why didn't I go home in the first of the evening, as soon as my work was done, like other folks? I then had money, and could have bought Mary and the baby something. But it's all gone now, and I feel the meanest thing alive. But I will not be scolded—no, that I won't stand. I will not be talked cross to, and told fifty times that I already know myself. I know I'm a fool! I know I get drunk, but nobody shall tell me so. Oh, my head! how it goes round. I'm sure I don't know where I'm going. I wish I was at home. Oh, my God! I wish I was cured of this failing. Oh, that there was not a drop of liquor to be had in the world! It is and must be a crime to sell it. Curse the day I took it, for I never, never shall be a man again!—never, never, never!"

And thus he went on for several blocks, talking all the while to himself, only interlarding his speech with here and there an oath. You would think him naturally a good-hearted fellow, and so he would be, were it not for that debasing influence of rum—that most powerful of all the demons, the blighter of many a family's happiness, the destroyer of many a human soul.

The wife all this time, was sitting at home in the "mumps." Most one o'clock, and Jasper not yet returned! but her own heart told her the reason why. There she sat by the fire, in dumb agony, while her young child slept unconscious in its crib—unconscious of its mother's grief, and of its father's erring steps. What a heavy load of misery was hers! How she doated upon that husband, and how she trembled for his safety! Each night when he was absent, she feared that some accident might have befallen him, and she harbored no thought of rest till she heard his steps upon the threshold of the door. But then her softness vanished, and pride and anger usurped the place of love.—Sometimes, however, in the lonely hours of her watch, the magic of memory carried her back to the days of her childhood and maidenhood. The image of her fond parents rose up before her—the happy days of her innocence cast their spell over her—her heart throbbed with wild emotion, and her eyes became suffused with tears. Such was her feelings on the night in question.

Jasper Hanly—him of whom we now write—was a young man of naturally excellent qualities. He was nurtured with great care by his parents, and the most correct principles were taught him. The principal fault of his early training was too much indulgence, and to this, possibly, may be traced the foundation of his present habits. At the age of fifteen, he had been put to a trade. His time was served out faithfully, at the expiration of which period, he packed all his worldly goods in a small trunk, and started for New York. Of prepossessing appearance and engaging address, he was not long in finding employment. For five whole years, Jasper was a pattern for all young men—temperate, industrious, and economical. For five long years he worked faithfully, and then he married. He married as fair and sweet a girl as ever blossomed into womanhood. She proved to Jasper a faithful wife—a frugal housekeeper, neat, active and industrious. In manner she was agreeable even unto fascination—in character she was candid even to bluntness; in temper she was quick as the steel. This latter trait brought her bitterness of heart.—You will wonder how a woman can be agreeable, fascinating, blunt, and quick of temper—she is qualitatively all comb and ad; but such was the character of Mary Hanly, and but for sole traits, the less amiable portion of her disposition might never, or seldom have been called into requisition, as she naturally inclined to the sunny side of humanity.

For the first three years of Jasper's marriage, no husband and wife ever led a happier life.—With the exception of the loss of their first-born, nothing had, up to that time, occurred to mar their happiness. This was a sad trial for them both, but Jasper seemed to bear the loss with less patience than Mary. Little Milly was his "pet bird," as he delighted to call her, and after her death it seemed that nothing could bring him comfort—not even the presence of his wife, nor the possession of another child.

Soon after this, it became apparent that he was in the frequent habit of indulging in stimulating drinks. The habit grew fast upon him, and with this fault came the association of evil and worthless companions. Mary was loath to believe her senses when for the first time she saw her husband come home intoxicated; but repetition coming upon repetition, soon opened her eyes to the fearful truth. It was a dreadful reality to her, though for weeks and months she bore it patiently and proudly, neither deigning nor condoning to notice it, though in secret she wept bitter tears. But patience at length wore out, and left the field to pride. Instead of the gentle influence that a wife should use to redeem an erring husband, she commenced to upbraid, and then—the charm was broken. Then fled from their hearthstone the quiet of domestic bliss. On such occasions Jasper's own temper ran high. He could not bear the "jarring discord of a scolding woman's tongue," as he expressed himself; and often when Mary would commence to pour out upon him her vials of wrath, would he leave her with a curse, and fly back to join his companions in deeper carousals.

Jasper pursued his homeward way, turning down Lisenpen street, at the lower end of which he with difficulty mounted the steps of a house, to the door, and rang the bell. He was so weak he could hardly stand, and the short time that elapsed before his summons was answered, seemed almost an age; though Mary no sooner heard the well-known signal, than she sprang with joyous haste to let the truant in, and had you been in the room as she left it, you could not have missed hearing the involuntary and joyous exclamation, "Thank God, at last!" as it escaped from her pale and deathly lips.

They met at the door—he sick at heart and angry with confusion—she stern, and cold, and silent. Jasper felt that he had done wrong, but would not condescend to apologize with Mary in her present temper; while she—pride, and a sense of injury kept her resolute in anger. Jasper entered, staggering, and as he passed his wife to go up stairs, she half shrank from him—it is even so, though all the time she felt as if she could have taken him in her arms. They passed on, up into their room, where he threw himself into an arm-chair, and she resumed her own seat by the fire. For ten or fifteen minutes sat they thus in silence, when Mary spoke:

"Don't you think, Jasper, you are getting in the habit of making good hours of late—out every night till one or two o'clock in the morning?"

Jasper heard each word distinctly spoken, but he deigned not a reply.

"Do you suppose I will submit to such treatment—sitting up all night and going without my supper, while you are out among a set of worthless companions, who only care for you so long as you spend your money."

Jasper felt the force of this remark, though somehow or other he could not help the rising of his anger.

"If you do think so," continued Mary, "you are much mistaken. You have no reason for staying out so late, and you knew that I had not a cent of money in the house."

Jasper did know this very well, and he knew more than that; but still, though his wife had such good reason to complain, his anger increased.

"I tell you, Jasper, I will submit to such treatment no longer—I will go home to my mother first."

"Where I wish to God you had always remained!" exclaimed Jasper, unable longer to control his rage.

"No doubt of it," said Mary. "You spoke the truth then if you ever did. But you will not have me long in your way, and then you can do as you please."

"No such good luck!" exclaimed Jasper maliciously, though his own heart upbraided him for such harshness.

"Jasper, you will drive me mad with your cold, heartless sneers. Oh, why was I so big a fool as ever to get married? What woman is not better off single, than with the best man in the world?"

"What man, you might say," said Jasper, "is not ten thousand times better off, having a woman tied round his neck, than all the married fools in creation."

"It's a pity you got married then."

"I wish to God I had not."

"You will break my heart, you brute."

"You forgot that somebody has written that women's hearts are not so easily broken. Yours is tough enough to stand a long while yet."

"I will leave you, and go home to my mother."

"I wish to heaven you had spirit enough to go."

"Perhaps you would like to turn me out of the house."

"Perhaps I might."

"You are not fit to be the husband of a hot-tent. You may no doubt think this all very right and proper, but I will not submit to it. You may go to-morrow among your friends where you spend your money, and see if they will give you a dinner. There is nothing in the house to eat—nothing for your child, even, whom I should think you would care about. You will feel very comfortable in the morning when you come to your senses, and bear the boy cry for food. He had better die—I wish he would."

"United States hotel, owned by J. B. Cross and others, and occupied by Edward Button, a total loss; with the stores underneath in which were the clothing store of H. Steinbart, R. H. Benton, C. H. Hurd, crockery store, Rood & Goodrich, watch and jewelry store, E. M. Shoyer, clothing store and others. This block is also in ruins.

Dickerman's block, containing the clothing store of S. Shoyer & co., the clothing store of P. Yale & co., and the clothing store of Wells & Co. The block was one of the ornaments of the city. The upper room was occupied by the Musical society as a concert room, and the second floor by the Merchant's mutual insurance co., Jason Downer, law office and others. This block is also in ruins.

"Because I choose to let you know how much I despise your filthy habits—because I wish to make you ashamed of yourself, if there is any shame left in you! Because I wish to let you know, if rum has not utterly destroyed your powers of conception, how positively contemptible is your character as a man!"

"Silence! How can you talk in that style to me? Who is the master of this house?"

"Not you, Jasper, I am sure. You are not even the master of your own senses. You need not put on your dignity to me, for I tell you once and again that I will not live with a drunkard. If you are so lost to all shame and decency, as not to know when to come home, and to spend all your time and money in low rumbustions, and among a set of worthless fellows, I will at least give you to understand that I will not submit to it. Either you must reform or we must part. That may as well be understood at once as put off to an indefinite period."

"Will you cease your infernal clack!" exclaimed Jasper, his cheeks burning with shame and rage.

"Never! While I have a voice to raise, I will not cease to reproach you for your impudent habits."

"Then you must talk to bare walls, and not to me."

CONGRESSIONAL CONVENTION.—We publish to-day, the call of the republican state central convention, for the holding of Assembly district conventions in all the districts within the second congressional district, of which Grant forms a part. So far as we know or believe, Grant will be fully represented by delegates from her assembly districts. Let there be a full convention of true men at Mineral Point, and let there be chosen a well tried man who has long been right, regardless of popular favor, and of his election no event is more certain. See that the candidate chosen is brave as well as sound, for there will be fighting to be done next congress. A brave man is never a doughty; he will fight for his principles and rights rather than give an inch. All our troubles have been caused by cowards who quailed under the silly threats of disunion, abolition, and other negroisms.—Grant County Herald.

Never abuse mosquitoes; they are blood relations.

It is a dark, cold, dreary night in the city—The lamps burn dimly, or are nearly out as is often the case when their light is most needed. The church clocks have struck the hour of twelve and the streets are quite deserted, with the exceptions of here and there a straggler hurrying homeward. The lead colored clouds hang low, and moist and murky, while a fog is driving inland from the bay, so dense that objects are scarcely discernable across the street.

Every place of business is closed in the city, with the exception of drinking saloons, and dens where the vilest poisons are dealt out to every one who calls and has the money to pay; and these, even at this late hour, are filled with men in all conditions of life, and in every phase of drunkenness. What a strange creature surely is man, for of all the animals ever created, he is the only one that voluntarily takes into his stomach that which he knows will injure him, and may crush all his prospects in life. He must have a sad conscience of his own, who would sell, and sell, and sell again, his poisoned alcohol to men already drunk, and whom he at the same time knows have wives to support and children to educate.

A few minutes after midnight, a man was seen to issue from a public house in the vicinity of the Park, and turn his steps up town, through Broadway. It is so dark we can scarcely designate his person, but one thing is very palpable—he is not exactly in that condition which becomes a gentleman. He swings, as he passes along, from the right to the left, and sometimes stumbles forward as though he would fall down were it not that some good angel, who yet has hope and patience, condescends to watch over and protect him.

Hark! he mutters as he goes along—for drunken men will always talk to themselves, and of themselves, and not always complimentary either. Something has vexed him, for he seems to be in a furious passion, and swears terribly. What has happened? Perhaps he will tell him-self—let us listen?

"What a fool!—what a cursed fool! It is nothing but rum, rum, and drak, drink from morning till night, from night till morning!—Wretch, fool, idiot! Not fit to live—what shall I do?—oh, God, what shall I do? Die!—that is the best thing I can do! Suppose I do die? Who would miss me? I wonder if it hard to drown? It cannot take long, and will soon be over; but then, I'm afraid—I never think of that without seeing my mother as she last stood before me to bid me good bye. Why, why didn't I go home in the first of the evening, as soon as my work was done, like other folks? I then had money, and could have bought Mary and the baby something. But it's all gone now, and I feel the meanest thing alive. But I will not be scolded—no, that won't stand. I will not be talked cross to, and told fifty times that I already know myself. I know I'm a fool! I know I get drunk, but nobody shall tell me so. Oh, my head? how it goes round. I sure I don't know where I'm going. I wish I was at home. Oh, my God! I wish I was cured of this failing. Oh, that there was not a drop of liquor to be had in the world!

It is and must be a crime to sell it. Curse the day I took it, for I never, never shall be a man again!—never, never, never!"

And thus he went on for several blocks, talking all the while to himself, only interlarding his speech with here and there an oath. You would think him naturally a good-hearted fellow, and so he would be, were it not for that debasing influence of rum—that most powerful of all the demons, the blighter of many a family's happiness, the destroyer of many a human soul.

The wife at this time, was sitting at home in the "mumps." Most one o'clock, and Jasper not yet returned! but her own heart told her the reason why. There she sat by the fire, in dumb agony, while her young child slept unconscious in its crib—unconscious of its mother's grief, and of its father's erring steps. What a heavy load of misery was hers! How she doated upon that husband, and how she trembled for his safety! Each night when he was absent, she feared that some accident might have befallen him, and she harbored no thought of rest till she heard his steps upon the threshold of the door. But then her softness vanished, and pride and anger usurped the place of love.—Sometimes, however, in the lonely hours of her watch, the magic of memory carried her back to the days of her childhood and maidenhood. The image of her fond parents rose up before her—the happy days of her innocence cast their spell over her—her heart throbbed with wild emotions, and her eyes became suffused with tears. Such was her feelings on the night in question.

Jasper Hanly—him of whom we now write—was a young man of naturally excellent qualities. He was nurtured with great care by his parents, and the most correct principles were taught him. The principal fault of his early training was too much indulgence, and to this, possibly, may be traced the foundation of his present habits. At the age of fifteen, he had been put to a trade. His time was served out faithfully, at the expiration of which period, he packed all his worldly goods in a small trunk, and started for New York. Of prepossessing appearance and engaging address, he was not long in finding employment. For five whole years, Jasper was a pattern for all young men—temperate, industrious, and economical. For five long years he worked faithfully, and then he married. He married as fair and sweet a girl as ever blossomed into womanhood. She proved to Jasper a faithful wife—a frugal housekeeper, neat, active and industrious. In manners she was agreeable even unto fascination—in character she was candid even to bluntness; in temper she was quick as the steel. This latter trait brought her bitterness of heart.—You will wonder how a woman can be agreeable, fascinating, blunt, and quick of temper!—so qualities all combined; but such was the character of Mary Hanly, and but for sole trial, the less amiable portion of her disposition might never, or seldom have been called into requisition, as she naturally inclined to the sunny side of humanity.

For the first three years of Jasper's marriage, no husband and wife ever led a happier life.—With the exception of the loss of their first-born, nothing had, up to that time, occurred to mar their happiness. This was a sad trial for them both, but Jasper seemed to bear the loss with less patience than Mary. Little Millie was his "pet bird," as he delighted to call her, and after her death it seemed that nothing could bring him comfort—not even the presence of his wife, nor the possession of another child.

Soon after this, it became apparent that he was in the frequent habit of indulging in stimulating drinks. The habit grew fast upon him, and with this fault came the association of evil and worthless companions. Mary was loath to believe her senses when for the first time she saw her husband come home intoxicated; but repetition coming upon repetition, soon opened her eyes to the fearful truth. It was a dreadful reality to her, though for weeks and months she bore it patiently and proudly, neither deigning nor condescending to notice it, though in secret she wept bitter tears. But patience at length wore out, and left the field to pride. Instead of the gentle influence that a wife should PUTNAM'S MONTHLY.—The September number of this "facile princeps" of American magazines is for sale at Sutherland's. We find it as ever fresh, lively and entertaining. Herman Melville with an improved style, continues "Israel Potter," and in a letter from one of the "strong minded," is noticeable, a quiet vein of good sense and satire, for us "lords of creation" to put in our pipes and smoke, figuratively speaking. It is truly pleasant to observe that the million are laying aside the old shilly shally (vide Benton for that word) style of monthlies, and in their place reading the scholarly and tasteful productions of our best American pens, as presented by friend Putnam. A fine portrait of the author of Swallow Barn graces the present number.

Jasper pursued his homeward way, turning down Lisenpernd street, at the lower end of which he with difficulty mounted the steps of a house, to the door, and rang the bell. He was so weak he could hardly stand, and the short time that elapsed before his summons was answered, seemed almost an age; though Mary no sooner heard the well-known signal, than she sprang with joyous haste to let the truant in, and had you been in the room as she left it, you could not have missed hearing the involuntary but joyful exclamation, "Thank God, at last!" as it escaped from her pale and deathly lips.

They met at the door—the sick at heart and angry with confusion—she stern, and cold, and silent. Jasper felt that he had done wrong, but would not condescend to apologize with Mary in her present temper; while she—pride, and a sense of injury kept her resolute in anger. Jasper entered, staggering, and as he passed his wife to go up stairs, she half shrank from him—it is even so, though all the time she felt as if she could have taken him in her arms. They passed on up into their room, where he threw himself into an arm-chair, and she resumed her own seat by the fire. For ten or fifteen minutes sat they thus in silence, when Mary spoke:

"Don't you think, Jasper, you are getting in the habit of making good hours of late—out every night till one or two o'clock in the morning?" Jasper heard each word distinctly spoken, but he deigned not a reply.

"Do you suppose I will submit to such treatment—sitting up all night and going without my supper, while you are out among a set of worthless companions, who only care for you so long as you spend your money?"

Jasper felt the force of that remark, though somehow or other he could not help the rising of his anger.

"If you do think so," continued Mary, "you are much mistaken. You have no reason for staying out so late, and you knew that I had not over; but then, I'm afraid—I never think of that without seeing my mother as she last stood before me to bid me good bye. Why, why didn't I go home in the first of the evening, as soon as my work was done, like other folks? I then had money, and could have bought Mary and the baby something. But it's all gone now, and I feel the meanest thing alive. But I will not be scolded—no, that won't stand. I will not be talked cross to, and told fifty times that I already know myself. I know I'm a fool! I know I get drunk, but nobody shall tell me so. Oh, my head? how it goes round. I sure I don't know where I'm going. I wish I was at home. Oh, my God! I wish I was cured of this failing. Oh, that there was not a drop of liquor to be had in the world!"

Jasper did know this very well, and he knew more than this; but still, though his wife had such good reason to complain, his anger increased.

"I tell you, Jasper, I will submit to such treatment no longer—I will go home to my mother first."

"Where I wish to God you had always remained!" exclaimed Jasper, unable longer to control his rage.

"No doubt of it," said Mary. "You spoke the truth then if you ever did. But you will not have me long in your way, and then you can do as you please."

"No such good luck!" exclaimed Jasper maliciously, though his own heart upbraided him for such harshness.

"Jasper, you will drive me mad with your cold, heartless sneers. Oh, why was I so big a fool as ever to get married? What woman is not better off single, than with the best man in the world?"

"What man, you might say," said Jasper, "is not ten thousand times better off, without having a woman tied round his neck, than all the married fools in creation?"

"It's a pity you got married then."

"I wish to God I had not."

"You will break my heart, you brute."

"You forget that somebody has written that women's hearts are not so easily broken. Yours is tough enough to stand a long while yet."

"I will leave you, and go home to my mother."

"I wish to heaven you had spirit enough to go."

"Perhaps you would like to turn me out of the house."

"Perhaps I might."

"You are not fit to be the husband of a Hot-tentot. You may no doubt think this all very right and proper, but I will not submit to it. You may go to-morrow among your friends where you spend your money, and see if they will give you a dinner. There is nothing in the house to eat—notthing for your child, even, whom I should think you would care about. You will feel very comfortable in the morning when you come to your senses, and hear the boy cry for food. He had better die—I wish he would. He had better die than live to see the shame of his father."

"Mary, why do you say such maddening things to me?"

"Because I choose to let you know how much I despise you filthy habits—because I wish to make you ashamed of yourself, if there is any shame left in you! Because I wish to let you know, if rum has not utterly destroyed your powers of conception, how positively contemptible is your character as a man!"

"Silence! How can you talk in that style to me? Who is the master of this house?"

"Not you, Jasper, I am sure. You are not even the master of your own senses. You need not put on your dignity to me, for I tell you once and again that I will not live with a drunkard. If you are so lost to all shame and decency, as not to know when to come home, and to spend all your time and money in low rumholes, and among a set of worthless fellows, I will at least give you to understand that I will not submit to it. Either you must reform or we must part. That may as well be understood at once as put off to an indefinite period."

"Will you cease your infernal clack!" exclaimed Jasper, his cheeks burning with shame and rage.

"Never! While I have a voice to raise, I will not cease to reproach you for your intemperate habits."

"Then you must talk to bare walls, and not to me."

[Concluded Monday.]

CONGRESSIONAL CONVENTION.—We publish to-day, the call of the republican state central convention, for the holding of Assembly district conventions in all the districts within the second congressional district, of which Grant forms a part. So far as we know or believe, Grant will be fully represented by delegates from his assembly districts.

"Let there be a full convention of true men at Mineral Point; and let there be chosen a well tried man who has long been right, regardless of popular favor, and of his election no event is more certain. See that the candidate chosen is brave as well as sound; for there will be fighting to be done next congress."

"A brave man is never a Douglass; he will fight for his principles and rights rather than give an inch. All our troubles have been caused by cowards who quailed under the silly threats of division, abolition, and other negroisms.—Grant County Herald."

Never abuse mosquitoes; they are blood relations.

the amount secured from the flames will be materially damaged in other ways.

Our own loss extends to the consumption of all our presses by the devouring element, including a Northrup power press, together with a new steam engine which we were just putting up, and which had never run, much furniture of a printing office, and a great amount of type standing on stones and standing galley, which could not be removed before the flames reached the office. our books and accounts were saved, or locked up in a fire proof safe, which it is believed will resist the action of the heat, and the most of the type in the office was carried out, and the most of our stock of paper, which however, is in a damaged condition, is also the type from the rough handling of hearts willing to help, but whose acquaintance with a printing office is slight. To them, however, and to many brother printers, who assisted in removing such of our effects as are in a place of safety, our warmest thanks are tendered.

Senator Atchison and the administration, determined to defeat Col. Benton, in Missouri, set to work with so much vigor and activity, that they not only "laid out" their adversary, but hoisted themselves besides, and threw the state into the hands of the whigs, where it is likely to remain for some time. The policy of the administration in this proceeding is similar to that of the negro who cut off the limb of a tree, high up on the trunk, on which he was standing, to get at a root. The first intuition he had of the nature of the performance was a fall to the ground that nearly drove the breath out of his body.—Buff. Com. Ad.

MESSRS. EDITORS.—Can't we by getting another issue of city bonds, raise the money to buy a lead team to run between here and Milwaukee, to carry the news? Anything would carry it sooner than the telegraph now does.

And also, while our hand is in, can't we raise the needful to lay down a strap rail between here and the lake, to carry off our grain? Great preparations have been made by the grain dealers for the full business. They have paid up to Milwaukee prices to get the wheat started in; they have their bags and their warehouses full and can't send their grain off. Large contracts are out for grain, which only with difficulty can be fulfilled, for the wants of means to send it off. One warehouse has already broken down front being overloaded.

On last Wednesday night the freight train from Milwaukee brought in only two cars and on Thursday three, while more than 20 car loads were waiting to go in. Probably fifteen or twenty cars could be filled every day could they be had. An immense amount of business will be done here this fall if the proper accommodations are afforded, but if the railroad breaks down now, what will it do when the rush commences. But perhaps what is said to other states is true: that this road is bound to drive all the trade they can from Janesville to the line P. M., to nominate a county ticket.

The towns and wards will be entitled to representation in the county convention as follows:—to wit:

Avon,	8	Janesville 1st ward 4
Beloit,	10	2d ward 4
Bradford,	4	3d ward 3
Caledonia,	3	4th ward 5
Clinton,	5	Milton, Magnolia, Newark, Plymouth, Porter, Rock, Spring Valley, Union, 17th SENATORIAL DISTRICT CONVENTION.

At the same time and place above designated in the respective towns and wards for meetings, to choose delegates to the county convention, the Republican electors of the wards of the city of Janesville, and of the towns in this county comprised in the 17th senatorial district, are requested to select an equal number of delegates to which they are entitled under the above appointment in the county convention, to represent them in a senatorial convention hereby called at the Court House in Janesville, on THURSDAY, the 12th day of October next, at 2 o'clock P. M., to nominate a candidate for senator.

By order of the County Committee.

ASSEMBLY DISTRICT CONVENTIONS—Rock County.

The Electors of Rock county who are opposed to the Nebraska inquiry and in favor of the principles announced in the "Republican Platform" adopted at Madison, July 13th, are requested to meet in MASS CONVENTION at the places designated below in their respective Assembly Districts, on TUESDAY, 5th of September next, at 2 o'clock P. M., and select two Delegates from each Assembly District to represent them in the Congressional Convention called at Mineral Point on the 12th of September.

The wooden block between the United States block, and Dickerman's block, containing the book store of H. F. Hull, and the confectionery store of H. Miller.

Dickerman's block, containing the clothing store of S. Shoyer & co., the clothing store of P. Yule & co., and the clothing store of Wells & co. The block was one of the ornaments of the city. The upper room was occupied by the Musical society as a concert room, and the second floor by the Merchant's mutual insurance co., Jason Dowser, law office and others. This block is also in ruins.

The Wisconsin Marine & Fire insurance company's brick building, containing the hat and cap store of P. Barker, the bank of the Wisconsin Marine and Fire insurance company, and the extensive printing establishment of the Daily Wisconsin. Nothing of this building but part of the bare walls, and the fire proof vault of the bank remain.

The Exchange block [brick] on Michigan st., occupied by Mallory's law office, G. W. Mygatt, architect, and others, has nothing left but the walls and chimneys.

The Tremont house, a wooden building, on Michigan street, from which the fire was communicated to the Exchange block and Wisconsin office, was burned to the ground, with the extensive wooden stable in the rear of the building, fronting on Main street, all of which leave no remains but the ashes which cover their sites.

Besides these, the extensive livery stables of Davis & co., mentioned above, and a whole row of wooden buildings fronting on Huron street, and extending round the corner of Main, so as to leave not a building on the whole block, where was some of the most valuable property in the city.

In addition to the above, the brick store of Sexton & co., and the whole row of buildings on the west side of East Water street, are injured by the flames crossing the street, more or less; but the damage to them is comparatively light, and believed to be covered by insurance.

It is impossible at the present hour, and in the confusion to which the loss of our office has subjected us to ascertain the amount of the loss. In view of the immense stocks of goods stored in the various buildings, and the valuable nature of the buildings themselves, the loss cannot be less, and will doubtless much exceed the sum of $500,000. A good amount of insurance was effected on much of the property; but not by any means enough to cover the loss. Many goods were saved; but such was the progress of the flames, and the necessity of hurry on the part of those who assisted in

It is a dark, cold, dreary night in the city—The lamps burn dimly, or are nearly out; as is often the case when their light is most needed. The church clocks have struck the hour of twelve and the streets are quite deserted, with the exceptions of here and there a straggler hurrying homeward. The lead colored clouds hang low, and moist and murky, while a fog is driving inland from the bay, so dense that objects are scarcely discernible across the street.

Every place of business is closed in the city, with the exception of drinking saloons, and dens where the vilest poisons are dealt out to every one who calls and has the money to pay; and these, even at this late hour, are filled with men in all conditions of life, and in every phase of drunkenness. What a strange creature surely is man, for of all the animals ever created, he is the only one that voluntarily takes into his stomach that which he knows will injure him, and may crush all his prospects in life. He must have a sad conscience of his own, who would sell, and sell again, his poisonous alcohol to men already drunk, and whom he at the same time knows have wives to support and children to educate.

A few minutes after midnight, a man was seen to issue from a public house in the vicinity of the Park, and turn his steps up town, through Broadway. It is so dark we can scarcely designate his person, but one thing is very palpable—he is not exactly in that condition which becomes a gentleman. He swings, as he passes along, from the right to the left, and sometimes stumbles forward as though he would fall down were it not that some good angel, who yet has hope and patience, conducts to watch over and protect him.

Hark! he mutters as he goes along—for drunken men will always talk to themselves, and of themselves and not always complimentary either. Something has vexed him, for he seems to be in a furious passion, and swears terribly. What has happened? Perhaps he will tell himself—let us listen?

"What a fool!—what a cursed fool? It is nothing but rum, rum, and drink, drink from morning till night, from night till morning!—Wretch, fool, idiot! Not fit to live!—what shall I do?—oh, God, what shall I do? Die!—that is the best thing I can do! Suppose I do? Who would miss me? I wonder if it is hard to drown? It cannot take long, and will soon be over; but then, I'm afraid—I never think of that without seeing my mother as she last stood before me to bid me good bye. Why, why didn't I go home in the first of the evening, as soon as my work was done, like other folks? I then had money, and could have bought Mary and the baby something. But it's all gone now, and I feel the meanest thing alive. But I will not be scolded—no, that I won't stand. I will not be talked cross to, and told fifty times that I already know myself. I know I'm a fool! I know I get drunk, but nobody shall tell me so. Oh, my head! how it goes round. I'm sure I don't know where I'm going. I wish I was at home. Oh, my God! I wish I was cured of this failing. Oh, that there was not a drop of liquor to be had in the world! It is and must be a crime to sell it. Curse the day I took it, for I never, never shall be a man again!—never, never, never!"

And thus he went on for several blocks, talking all the while to himself, only interlarding his speech with here and there an oath. You would think him naturally a good-hearted fellow, and so he would be, were it not for that debasing influence of rum—that most powerful of all the demons, the blighter of many a family's happiness, the destroyer of many a human soul.

The wife all this time, was sitting at home in "the mumps." Most one o'clock, and Jasper not yet returned; but her own heart told her the reason why. There she sat by the fire, in dumb agony, while her young child slept unconscious in its crib—unconscious of its mother's grief, and of its father's erring steps. What a heavy load of misery was hers! How she grieved upon that husband, and how she trembled for his safety! Each night when he was absent, she feared that some accident might befall him, and she harbored no thought of rest till she heard his steps upon the threshold of the door. But then her softness vanished, and pride and anger usurped the place of love.—Sometimes, however, in the lonely hours of her watch, the magic of memory carried her back to the days of her childhood and maidenhood. The image of her fond parents rose up before her—the happy days of her innocence cast their spell over her—her heart throbbed with wild emotions, and her eyes became suffused with tears. Such was her feelings on the night in question.

Jasper Hanly—him of whom we now write—was a young man of naturally excellent qualities. He was nurtured with great care by his parents, and the most correct principles were taught him. The principal fault of his early training was too much indulgence, and to this, possibly, may be traced the foundation of his present habits. At the age of fifteen, he had been put to a trade. His time was served out faithfully, at the expiration of which period, he packed all his worldly goods in a small trunk, and started for New York. Of prepossessing appearance and engaging address, he was not long in finding employment. For five whole years, Jasper was a pattern for all young men—temperate, industrious, and economical. For five long years he worked faithfully, and then he married. He married as fair and sweet a girl as ever blossomed into womanhood. She proved to Jasper a faithful wife—a frugal housekeeper, neat, active and industrious. In manners she was agreeable even to fascination—in character she was candid even to bluntness; in temper she was quick as the steel. This latter trait brought her bitterness of heart.—You will wonder how a woman can be agreeable, fascinating, blunt, and quick of temper—so qualified all combined; but such was the character of Mary Hanly, and but for severe trials, the less amiable portion of her disposition might never, or seldom have been called into requisition, as she naturally inclined to the sunny side of humanity.

For the first three years of Jasper's marriage, no husband and wife ever led a happier life.—With the exception of the loss of their first-born, nothing had, up to that time, occurred to mar their happiness. This was a sad trial for them both, but Jasper seemed to bear the loss with less patience than Mary. Little Millie was his "pet bird," as he delighted to call her, and after her death it seemed that nothing could bring him comfort—not even the presence of his wife, nor the possession of another child.

Soon after this, it became apparent that he was in the frequent habit of indulging in stimulating drinks. The habit grew fast upon him, and with this fault came the association of evil and worthless companions. Many was loath to believe her senses when for the first time she saw her husband come home intoxicated; but repetition coming upon repetition, soon opened her eyes to the fearful truth. It was a dreadful reality to her, though for weeks and months she bore it patiently and proudly, neither deigning nor condescending to notice it, though in secret she wept bitter tears. But patience at length wore out, and left the field to pride. Instead of the gentle influence that a wife should use to redeem an erring husband, she commenced to upbraid, and then—the charm was broken. Then fled from their heartsease the quiet of domestic bliss. On such occasions Jasper's own temper ran high. He could not bear the "jarring discord of a scolding woman's tongue," as he expressed himself; and often when Mary would commence to pour out upon him her vials of wrath, would he leave her with a curse, and fly back to join his companions in deeper carousals.

Jasper pursued his homeward way, turning down Lisenend street, at the lower end of which he with difficulty mounted the steps of a house, to the door, and rang the bell. He was so weak he could hardly stand, and the short time that elapsed before his summons was answered, seemed almost an age; though Mary sooner heard the well-known signal, than she sprang with joyous haste to let the truant in, and had you been in the room as she left it, you could not have missed hearing the involuntary but joyous exclamation, "Thank God, at last!" but it escaped from her pale and deathly lips.

They met at the door—he sick at heart and angry with confusion—she stern, and cold, and silent. Jasper felt that he had done wrong, but would not condescend to apologize with Mary in her present temper; while she—pride, and a sense of injury kept her resolute in anger. Jasper entered, staggering, and as he passed his wife to go upstairs, she half shrank from him—it is even so, though all the time she felt as if she could have taken him in her arms. They passed on, up into their room, where he threw himself into an arm-chair, and she resumed her own seat by the fire. For ten or fifteen minutes sat they thus in silence, when Mary spoke:

"Don't you think, Jasper, you are getting in the habit of making good hours of late—out every night till one or two o'clock in the morning?"

Jasper heard each word distinctly spoken, but he designed not a reply.

"Do you suppose I will submit to such treatment—sitting up all night and going without my supper, while you are out among a set of worthless companions, who only care for you so long as you spend your money?"

Jasper left the force of this remark, though somehow or other he could not help the rising of his anger.

"If you do think so," continued Mary, "you are much mistaken. You have no reason for staying out so late, and you knew that I had not a cent of money in the house."

Jasper did know this very well, and he knew more than this; but still, though his wife had such good reason to complain, his anger increased.

"I tell you, Jasper, I will submit to such treatment no longer—I will go home to my mother first."

"Where I wish to God you had always remained!" exclaimed Jasper, unable longer to control his rage.

"No doubt of it," said Mary. "You spoke the truth then if you ever did. But you will not have me long in your way, and then you can do as you please."

"No such good luck!" exclaimed Jasper maliciously, though his own heart upbraided him for such harshness.

"Jasper, you will drive me mad with your cold, heartless sneers. Oh, why was I so big a fool as ever to get married? What woman is not better off single, than with the best man in the world."

"What man, you might say," said Jasper, "is not ten thousand times better off, without having a woman tied round his neck, than all the married fools in creation?"

"It's a pity you got married then."

"I wish to God I had not."

"You will break my heart, you brute."

"You forget that somebody has written that women's hearts are not so easily broken.—Yours is tough enough to stand a long while yet."

"I will leave you, and go home to my mother."

"I wish to heaven you had spirit enough to go."

"Perhaps you would like to turn me out of the house."

"Perhaps I might."

"You are not fit to be the husband of a Hot-totter. You may no doubt think this all very right and proper, but I will not submit to it. You may go to-morrow among your friends where you spend your money, and see if they will give you a dinner. There is nothing in the house to eat—noting for your child, even whom I should think you would care about. You will feel very comfortable in the morning when you come to your senses and hear the boy cry for food. He had better die—I wish he would. He had better die than live to see the shame of his father."

"United States hotel, owned by J. B. Cross and others, and occupied by Edward Button, a total loss; with the stores underneath in which were the clothing store of H. Steinhardt, R. H. Banton, C. H. Hurd, crockery store, Rood & Goodrich, watch and jewelry store, E. M. Shover, clothing store and others."

Dickerman's block, containing the clothing store of S. Shoyer & co., the clothing store of P. Yale & co., and the clothing store of Wells & co. The block was one of the ornaments of the city. The upper room was occupied by the Musical society as a concert room, and the second floor by the Merchant's mutual insurance company, Jason Downer, law office, and others. This block is also in ruins.

The Wisconsin Marine & Fire insurance company's brick building, containing the hat and cap store of P. Barker, the bank of the Wisconsin Marine & Fire insurance company, and the extensive printing establishment of the Daily Wisconsin. Nothing of this building but part of the bare walls, and the fire proof vault of the bank remain.

The Exchange block [brick] on Michigan st. occupied by Mallory's law office, G. W. Mygatt, architect, and others, has nothing left but the walls and chimneys.

The Tremont house, a wooden building, on Michigan street, from which the fire was communicated to the Exchange block and Wisconsin office, was burned to the ground, with the extensive wooden stable in the rear of the building, fronting on Main street, all of which leave no remains but the ashes which cover their sites.

Besides these, the extensive livery stables of Davis & co., mentioned above, and a whole row of wooden buildings fronting on Huron street, and extending round the corner of Main, so as to leave not a building on the whole block, where was some of the most valuable property in the city.

In addition to the above, the brick store of Sexton & co., and the whole row of buildings on the west side of East Water street, are injured by the flames crossing the street, more or less; but the damage to them is comparatively light, and believed to be covered by insurance.

It is impossible at the present hour, and in the confusion to which the loss of our office has subjected us to ascertain the amount of the loss.

In view of the immense stocks of goods stored in the various buildings, and the valuable nature of the buildings themselves, the loss cannot be less, and will doubtless much exceed the sum of $500,000. A good amount of insurance was effected on much of the property; but not by any means enough to cover the loss. Many goods were saved; but such was the progress of the flames, and the necessity of hurry on the part of those who assisted in the rescue, that PETTNA'S MONTHLY.—The September number of this "fanciful prince" of American magazines is for sale at Sutherland's. We find it an ever fresh, lively and entertaining. Herman Melville with an improved style, continues "Israel Potter," and in a letter from one of the "strong minded," is noticeable, a quiet vein of good sense and satire, for us "lords of creation" to put in our pipes and smoke, figuratively speaking. It is truly pleasant to observe that the million are laying aside the old "shilly shally" (says Benton for that word) style of mouthlings, and in their place reading the scholarly and tasteful productions of our best American pens, as presented by friend Putnam. A fine portrait of the author of "Swallow Barn" graces the present number.

We shall give our friends early notice of the arrival of Bayard Taylor's new book, and will endeavor for the future to keep our readers advised of new publications and our humble opinions thereon, as well as our varied editorial duties will admit.

MESSRS. EDITORS.—Can't we by getting another issue of city bonds, raise the money to buy a lead team to run between here and Milwaukee, to carry the news? Anything would carry it sooner than the telegraph now does.

And also, while our hand is in, can't we raise the needful to lay down a strap rail between here and the lake, to carry off our grain? Great preparations have been made by the grain dealers for the full business. They have paid up to Milwaukee prices to get the wheat started in; they have their bags and their warehouses full and can't send their grain off. Large contracts are out for grain, which only with difficulty can be fulfilled, for the wants of means to send it off. One warehouse has already broken down from being overloaded.

On last Wednesday night the freight train from Milwaukee brought in only two cars and on Thursday three, while more than 20 car loads were waiting to go in. Probably fifteen or twenty cars could be filled every day could they be had. An immense amount of business will be done here this fall if the proper accommodations are afforded, but if the railroad breaks down now, what will it do when the rush commences. But perhaps what is said to other stations is true: that this road is bound to drive all the trade they can from Janesville to the line north.

"A SUFFERER." From the Daily Wisconsin, Extra.

TERRIBLE FIRE.

A WHOLE BLOCK IN RUINS.—About twelve o'clock at noon to-day, a fire broke out somewhere near the livery stable of S. B. & J. Davis, either in that or some of the adjoining wooden buildings on Huron street, and spread rapidly from there to the United States hotel at the corner of East Water and Huron, and, to the long line of wooden buildings on Main street from Huron to Michigan, and from there to the other buildings in the block bounded by East Water, Huron, Main and Michigan streets, which in three hours was laid totally in ruins. The fire department was immediately on the ground; but all attempts to save any of the buildings were ineffectual, and ashes and bare walls are now all that remain of one of the most valuable blocks in our city. The fire crossed over from the east side of East Water street, and did some damage to the brick buildings on the opposite side of the street. The chief losses as far as we can recollect in the hurry of the moment, are as follows:

It is a dark, cold, dreary night in the city—The lamps burn dimly, or are nearly out as is often the case when their light is most needed. The church clocks have struck the hour of twelve and the streets are quite deserted, with the exceptions of here and there a straggler hurrying homeward. The lead colored clouds hang low, and moist and murky, while a fog is driving inland from the bay, so dense that objects are scarcely discernible across the street.

Every place of business is closed in the city, with the exception of drinking saloons, and dens where the vilest poisons are dealt out to every one who calls and has the money to pay; and these, even at this late hour, are filled with men in all conditions of life, and in every phase of drunkenness. What a strange creature surely is man, for of all the animals ever created, he is the only one that voluntarily takes into his stomach that which he knows will injure him, and may crush all his prospects in life. He must have a sad conscience of his own, who would sell, and sell, and sell again, his poison alcohol to men already drunk, and whom he at the same time knows have wives to support and children to educate.

A few minutes after midnight, a man was seen to issue from a public house in the vicinity of the Park, and turn his steps up town, through Broadway. It is so dark we can scarcely designate his person, but one thing is very palpable—he is not exactly in that condition which becomes a gentleman. He swings, as he passes along, from the right to the left, and sometimes stumbles forward as though he would fall down were it not that some good angel, who yet has hope and patience, condescends to watch over and protect him.

Hark! he mutters as he goes along—for drunken men will always talk to themselves, and of themselves, and not always complimentarily either. Something has vexed him, for he seems to be in a furious passion, and swears terribly. What has happened? Perhaps he will tell himself—let us listen?

"What a fool!—what a cursed fool? It is nothing but rum, rum, and drink, drink from morning till night, from night till morning!—Wretch, fool, idiot! Not fit to live—what shall I do?—oh, God, what shall I do? Die!—that is the best thing I can do. Suppose I do die? Who would miss me? I wonder if it is hard to drown? It cannot take long, and will soon be over; but then, I'm afraid—I never think of that without seeing my mother as she last stood before me to bid me good bye. Why, why didn't I go home in the first of the evening, as soon as my work was done, like other folks? I then had money, and could have bought Mary and the baby something. But it's all gone now, and I feel the meanest thing alive. But I will not be scolded no, that I won't stand. I will not be talked cross to, and told fifty times that I already know myself. I know I'm a fool! I know I get drunk, but nobody shall tell me so. Oh, my head? how it goes round. I'm sure I don't know where I'm going. I wish I was at home. Oh, my God! I wish I was cured of this failing. Oh, that there was not a drop of liquor to be had in the world! It is and must be a crime to sell it. Curse the day I took it, for I never, never shall be a man again!—never, never, never!"

And thus he went on for several blocks, talking all the while to himself, only interlarding his speech with here and there an oath. You would think him naturally a good-hearted fellow, and so he would be, were it not for that debasing influence of rum—that most powerful of all the demons, the blighter of many a family's happiness, the destroyer of many a human soul.

The wife all this time, was sitting at home in the "mumps." Most one o'clock, and Jasper not yet returned; but her own heart told her the reason why. There she sat by the fire, in dumb agony, while her young child slept unconscious in its crib—unconscious of its mother's grief, and of its father's erring steps. What a heavy load of misery was hers! How she doated upon that husband, and how she trembled for his safety! Each night when he was absent, she feared that some accident might have befallen him, and she harbored no thought of rest till she heard his steps upon the threshold of the door. But then her softness vanished, and pride and anger usurped the place of love.—Sometimes, however, in the lonely hours of her watch, the magic of memory carried her back to the days of her childhood and maidenhood. The image of her fond parents rose up before her—the happy days of her innocence cast their spell over her—her heart throbbed with wild emotions, and her eyes became suffused with tears. Such was her feelings on the night in question.

Jasper Hanly—him of whom we now write—was a young man of naturally excellent qualities. He was nurtured with great care by his parents, and the most correct principles were taught him. The principal fault of his early training was too much indulgence, and to this, possibly, may be traced the foundation of his present habits. At the age of fifteen, he had been put to a trade. His time was served out faithfully, at the expiration of which period, he packed all his worldly goods in a small trunk, and started for New York. Of proposing appearance and engaging address, he was not long in finding employment. For five whole years, Jasper was a pattern for all young men—temperate, industrious, and economical. For five long years he worked faithfully, and then he married. He married as fair and sweet a girl as ever blossomed into womanhood. She proved to Jasper faithful wife—a frugal housekeeper, neat, active and industrious. In manner she was agreeable even unto fascination—in character she was candid even to bluntness; in temper she was quick as the steel. This latter trait brought her bitterness of heart.—You will wonder how a woman can be agreeable, fascinating, blunt, and quick of temper—so quale's a' all comb'n'd; but such was the character of Mary Hanly, and but forsooth trials, the less amiable portion of her disposition might never, or seldom have been called into requisition, as she naturally inclined to the sunny side of humanity.

For the first three years of Jasper's marriage, no husband and wife ever led a happier life.—With the exception of the loss of their first-born, nothing had, up to that time, occurred to mar their happiness. This was a sad trial for them both, but Jasper seemed to bear the loss with less patience than Mary. Little Milly was his "pet bird," as he delighted to call her, and after her death it seemed that nothing could bring him comfort—not even the presence of his wife, nor the possession of another child.

Soon after this, it became apparent that he was in the frequent habit of indulging in stimulants. The habit grew fast upon him, and with this fault came the association of evil and worthless companions. Mary was loath to believe her senses when for the first time she saw her husband come home intoxicated; but repetition coming upon repetition, soon opened her eyes to the fearful truth. It was a dreadful reality to her, though for weeks and months she bore it patiently and proudly, neither defrauding nor condoning to notice it, though in secret she wept bitter tears. But patience at length wore out, and left the field to pride. Instead of the gentle influence that a wife should use to redeem an erring husband, she commenced to upbraid, and then—the charm was broken. Then fled from their hearthstone the quiet of domestic bliss. On such occasions Jasper's own temper ran high. He could not bear the jarring record of a scolding woman's tongue," as he expressed himself; and often when Mary would commence to pour out upon him her vials of wrath, would he leave her with a curse, and fly back, to join his companions in deeper carousals.

Jasper pursued his homeward way, turning down Lisenburgh street, at the lower end of which he with difficulty mounted the steps of a house, to the door, and rang the bell. He was so weak he could hardly stand, and the short time that elapsed before his summons was answered, seemed almost an age; though Mary no sooner heard the well-known signal, than she sprang with joyous haste to let the trumpet in, and had you been in the room as she left it, you could not have missed hearing the involuntary but joyous exclamation, "Thank God, at last!" as it escaped from her pale and deadly lips.

They met at the door—he sick at heart, and angry with confusion—she stern, and cold, and silent. Jasper felt that he had done wrong, but would not descend to apologize with Mary in her present temper; while she—pride, and a sense of injury kept her resolute in anger. Jasper entered, staggering, and as he passed his wife to go up stairs, she half shrank from him—it is even so, though all the time she felt as if she could have taken him in her arms. They passed on, up into their room, where he threw himself into an arm-chair, and she resumed her own seat by the fire. For ten or fifteen minutes sat they thus in silence, when Mary spoke:

"Don't you think, Jasper, you are getting in the habit of making good hours of late—out every night till one or two o'clock in the morning?"

Jasper heard each word distinctly spoken, but he designed not a reply.

"Do you suppose I will submit to such treatment—sitting up all night and going without my supper, while you are out among a set of worthless companions, who only care for you so long as you spend your money?"

Jasper felt the force of this remark, though somehow or other he could not help the rising of his anger.

"If you do think so," continued Mary, "you are much mistaken. You have no reason for staying out so late, and you knew that I had over; but then, I'm afraid—I never think of that without seeing my mother as she last stood before me to bid me good bye. Why, why didn't I go home in the first of the evening, as soon as my work was done, like other folks? I then had money, and could have bought Mary and the baby something. CONGRESSIONAL CONVENTION.—We publish to-day, the call of the republican state central convention, for the holding of Assembly district conventions in all the districts within the second congressional district, of which Grant forms a part. So far as we know or believe, Grant will be fully represented by delegates from their assembly districts. Let there be a full convention of true men at Mineral Point, and let there be chosen a well tried man who has long been right, regardless of popular favor, and of his election no event is more certain. See that the candidate chosen is brave as well as sound, for there will be fighting to be done next congress. A brave man is never a doughtie; he will fight for his principles and rights rather than give an inch. All our troubles have been caused by cowards who quailed under the silly threats of disunion, abolition, and other negrosisms.—Grant County Herald.

5 NEW SHEET MUSIC SUPPLY.</b

It is a dark, cold, dreary night in the city—The lamps burn dimly, or are nearly out as is often the case when their light is most needed. The church clocks have struck the hour of twelve and the streets are quite deserted, with the exceptions of here and there a straggler hurrying homeward. The lead colored clouds hang low, and moist and murky, while a fog is driving inland from the bay, so dense that objects are scarcely discernible across the street.

Every place of business is closed in the city, with the exception of drinking saloons, and dens where the vilest poisons are dealt out to every one who calls and has the money to pay; and these, even at this late hour, are filled with men in all conditions of life, and in every phase of drunkenness. What a strange creature surely is man, for of all the animals ever created, he is the only one that voluntarily takes into his stomach that which he knows will injure him, and may crush all his prospects in life. He must have a sad conscience of his own, who would sell, and sell, and sell again, his poison alcohol to men already drunk, and whom he at the same time knows have wives to support and children to educate.

A few minutes after midnight, a man was seen to issue from a public house in the vicinity of the Park, and turn his steps up town, through Broadway. It is so dark we can scarcely designate his person, but one thing is very palpable—he is not exactly in that condition which becomes a gentleman. He swings, as he passes along, from the right to the left, and sometimes stumbles forward as though he would fall down were it not that some good angel, who yet has hope and patience, condescends to watch over and protect him.

Hark! he mutters as he goes along—for drunken men will always talk to themselves, and of themselves, and not always complimentarily either. Something has vexed him, for he seems to be in a furious passion, and swears terribly. What has happened? Perhaps he will tell himself—let us listen?

"What a fool!—what a cursed fool? It is nothing but rum, rum, and drink, drink from morning till night, from night till morning!—Wretch, fool, idiot! Not fit to live—what shall I do?—oh, God, what shall I do? Die!—that is the best thing I can do. Suppose I do die? Who would miss me? I wonder if it is hard to drown? It cannot take long, and will soon be over; but then, I'm afraid—I never think of that without seeing my mother as she last stood before me to bid me good bye. Why, why didn't I go home in the first of the evening, as soon as my work was done, like other folks? I then had money, and could have bought Mary and the baby something. But it's all gone now, and I feel the meanest thing alive. But I will not be scolded no, that I won't stand. I will not be talked cross to, and told fifty times that I already know myself. I know I'm a fool! I know I get drunk, but nobody shall tell me so. Oh, my head? how it goes round. I'm sure I don't know where I'm going. I wish I was at home. Oh, my God! I wish I was cured of this failing. Oh, that there was not a drop of liquor to be had in the world! It is and must be a crime to sell it. Curse the day I took it, for I never, never shall be a man again!—never, never, never!"

And thus he went on for several blocks, talking all the while to himself, only interlarding his speech with here and there an oath. You would think him naturally a good-hearted fellow, and so he would be, were it not for that debasing influence of rum—that most powerful of all the demons, the blighter of many a family's happiness, the destroyer of many a human soul.

The wife all this time, was sitting at home in the "mumps." Most one o'clock, and Jasper not yet returned; but her own heart told her the reason why. There she sat by the fire, in dumb agony, while her young child slept unconscious in its crib—unconscious of its mother's grief, and of its father's erring steps. What a heavy load of misery was hers! How she doated upon that husband, and how she trembled for his safety! Each night when he was absent, she feared that some accident might have befallen him, and she harbored no thought of rest till she heard his steps upon the threshold of the door. But then her softness vanished, and pride and anger usurped the place of love.—Sometimes, however, in the lonely hours of her watch, the magic of memory carried her back to the days of her childhood and maidenhood. The image of her fond parents rose up before her—the happy days of her innocence cast their spell over her—her heart throbbed with wild emotions, and her eyes became suffused with tears. Such was her feelings on the night in question.

Jasper Hanly—him of whom we now write—was a young man of naturally excellent qualities. He was nurtured with great care by his parents, and the most correct principles were taught him. The principal fault of his early training was too much indulgence, and to this, possibly, may be traced the foundation of his present habits. At the age of fifteen, he had been put to a trade. His time was served out faithfully, at the expiration of which period, he packed all his worldly goods in a small trunk, and started for New York. Of proposing appearance and engaging address, he was not long in finding employment. For five whole years, Jasper was a pattern for all young men—temperate, industrious, and economical. For five long years he worked faithfully, and then he married. He married as fair and sweet a girl as ever blossomed into womanhood. She proved to Jasper faithful wife—a frugal housekeeper, neat, active and industrious. In manner she was agreeable even unto fascination—in character she was candid even to bluntness; in temper she was quick as the steel. This latter trait brought her bitterness of heart.—You will wonder how a woman can be agreeable, fascinating, blunt, and quick of temper—so quale's a' all comb'n'd; but such was the character of Mary Hanly, and but forsooth trials, the less amiable portion of her disposition might never, or seldom have been called into requisition, as she naturally inclined to the sunny side of humanity.

For the first three years of Jasper's marriage, no husband and wife ever led a happier life.—With the exception of the loss of their first-born, nothing had, up to that time, occurred to mar their happiness. This was a sad trial for them both, but Jasper seemed to bear the loss with less patience than Mary. Little Milly was his "pet bird," as he delighted to call her, and after her death it seemed that nothing could bring him comfort—not even the presence of his wife, nor the possession of another child.

Soon after this, it became apparent that he was in the frequent habit of indulging in stimulants. The habit grew fast upon him, and with this fault came the association of evil and worthless companions. Mary was loath to believe her senses when for the first time she saw her husband come home intoxicated; but repetition coming upon repetition, soon opened her eyes to the fearful truth. It was a dreadful reality to her, though for weeks and months she bore it patiently and proudly, neither defrauding nor condoning to notice it, though in secret she wept bitter tears. But patience at length wore out, and left the field to pride. Instead of the gentle influence that a wife should use to redeem an erring husband, she commenced to upbraid, and then—the charm was broken. Then fled from their hearthstone the quiet of domestic bliss. On such occasions Jasper's own temper ran high. He could not bear the jarring record of a scolding woman's tongue," as he expressed himself; and often when Mary would commence to pour out upon him her vials of wrath, would he leave her with a curse, and fly back, to join his companions in deeper carousals.

Jasper pursued his homeward way, turning down Lisenburgh street, at the lower end of which he with difficulty mounted the steps of a house, to the door, and rang the bell. He was so weak he could hardly stand, and the short time that elapsed before his summons was answered, seemed almost an age; though Mary no sooner heard the well-known signal, than she sprang with joyous haste to let the trumpet in, and had you been in the room as she left it, you could not have missed hearing the involuntary but joyous exclamation, "Thank God, at last!" as it escaped from her pale and deadly lips.

They met at the door—he sick at heart, and angry with confusion—she stern, and cold, and silent. Jasper felt that he had done wrong, but would not descend to apologize with Mary in her present temper; while she—pride, and a sense of injury kept her resolute in anger. Jasper entered, staggering, and as he passed his wife to go up stairs, she half shrank from him—it is even so, though all the time she felt as if she could have taken him in her arms. They passed on, up into their room, where he threw himself into an arm-chair, and she resumed her own seat by the fire. For ten or fifteen minutes sat they thus in silence, when Mary spoke:

"Don't you think, Jasper, you are getting in the habit of making good hours of late—out every night till one or two o'clock in the morning?"

Jasper heard each word distinctly spoken, but he designed not a reply.

"Do you suppose I will submit to such treatment—sitting up all night and going without my supper, while you are out among a set of worthless companions, who only care for you so long as you spend your money?"

Jasper felt the force of this remark, though somehow or other he could not help the rising of his anger.

"If you do think so," continued Mary, "you are much mistaken. You have no reason for staying out so late, and you knew that I had over; but then, I'm afraid—I never think of that without seeing my mother as she last stood before me to bid me good bye. Why, why didn't I go home in the first of the evening, as soon as my work was done, like other folks? I then had money, and could have bought Mary and the baby something. CONGRESSIONAL CONVENTION.—We publish to-day, the call of the republican state central convention, for the holding of Assembly district conventions in all the districts within the second congressional district, of which Grant forms a part. So far as we know or believe, Grant will be fully represented by delegates from their assembly districts. Let there be a full convention of true men at Mineral Point, and let there be chosen a well tried man who has long been right, regardless of popular favor, and of his election no event is more certain. See that the candidate chosen is brave as well as sound, for there will be fighting to be done next congress. A brave man is never a doughtie; he will fight for his principles and rights rather than give an inch. All our troubles have been caused by cowards who quailed under the silly threats of disunion, abolition, and other negrosisms.—Grant County Herald.

KIMBER'S ROCK OILS,

FROM A WELL 100 feet deep, Near Pittsburgh, Pa., is offered to the public as a Natural Medicine of no common value. It is a different thing from the old Kentucky or American Oil, as this is USED INTERNALLY as well as externally. As a local remedy in Paroxysms, Rheumatism, Deafness, Loss of Sight, Burns, &c., also as a valuable Internal Remedy for Piles, Ague, Scrofula, Coughs, Diarrhea, Erysipelas, old Sores, Eruptions of the Skin, Venereal Diseases, Worms, Bladder and Kidney Diseases, Palpitation, &c. It invites the investigating Physician, as well as the suffering patient, to become acquainted with its merits.

Discovered in 1840, it has within 2 or 3 years, made multitudes of cures, and multitudes of friends—and as soon as tried, the Sales not only increase but hold out. Testimony to its great merit is constantly accumulating in the hands of the proprietor by certificates, letters, and in other ways.

IT DOCTORS THE WHOLE MAN—flesh and blood—skin and bones—from head to foot—in how it acts upon the system, it is difficult to find any efficient manifestations, we cannot tell all. Whilst it is a powerful medicine, it is alternative—and mind you, a REGULATOR. A leading principle in it is Noether. When you once have it in the family you will not be without it.

Full as the world is of Patent Medicines—it is thought best to suppress this, the work of NATURE itself, to make room for HUMAN INVENTIONS. Price 50 cents per bottle. It can be had of wholesalers at the large cities and towns in the West at Proprietor's prices.

HAVE WE AGUE AMONG US?—A tea spoonful every three hours in the absence of the fever will cure you of the ague, and if you are a physician, Druggist, apothecary, or manufacturer, will do well to recommend this Oil for PHYLLOSPUS UTERI, and get up a bottle—take the usual dose 2 or 3 times a day, and brother the lower part of the back with it. Have you SCROFOLIA? The Petroleum will eradicate it, root and branch, at little cost or inconvenience. Get circulars of directions for adults and children, gratis of the agent. A trial is all we ask. Mind and get the right kind—it is of a beautiful reddish color and clear. Try it for piles.

It is a dark, cold, dreary night in the city—The lamps burn dimly, or are nearly out as is often the case when their light is most needed. The church clocks have struck the hour of twelve and the streets are quite deserted, with the exceptions of here and there a straggler hurrying homeward. The lead-colored clouds hang low, and moist and murky, while a fog is driving inland from the bay, so dense that objects are scarcely discernible across the street.

Every place of business is closed in the city, with the exception of drinking saloons, and dens where the vilest poisons are dealt out to every one who calls and has the money to pay; and these, even at this late hour, are filled with men in all conditions of life, and in every phase of drunkenness. What strange creature surely is man, for of all the animals ever created, he is the only one that voluntarily takes into his stomach that which he knows will injure him, and may dash all his prospects in life. He must have a sad conscience of his own, who would sell, and sell, and sell again, his poisonous alcohol to men already drunk, and whom he at the same time knows have wives to support and children to educate.

A few minutes after midnight, a man was seen to issue from a public house in the vicinity of the Park, and turn his steps up town, through Broadway. It is so dark we can scarcely designate his person, but one thing is very palpable—he is not exactly in that condition which becomes a gentleman. He swings, as he passes along, from the right to the left, and sometimes stumbles forward as though he would fall down were it not that some good angel, who yet has hope and patience, condescends to watch over and protect him.

Hark! he mutters as he goes along—for drunken men will always talk to themselves, and of themselves, and not always complimentary either. Something has vexed him, for he seems to be in a furious passion, and swears terribly. What has happened? Perhaps he will tell himself—let us listen?

"What a fool!—what a cursed fool? It is nothing but rum, rum, and drink, drink from morning till night, from night till morning!—Wretch, fool, idiot! Not fit to live!—what shall I do?—oh, God, what shall I do? Die!—that is the best thing I can do! Suppose I do die? Who would miss me? I wonder if it is hard to drown? It cannot take long, and will soon be over; but then, I'm afraid!—I never think of that without seeing my mother as she last stood before me to bid me good bye. Why, why didn't I go home in the first of the evening, as soon as my work was done, like other folks? I then had money, and could have bought Mary and the baby something. But it's all gone now, and I feel the meanest thing alive. But will not be scolded—no, that I won't stand. I will not be talked cross to, and told fifty times that I already know myself. I know I'm a fool! I know I get drunk, but nobody shall tell me so. Oh, my head? how it goes round. I'm sure I don't know where I'm going. I wish I was at home. Oh, my God! I wish I was cured of this failing. Oh, that there was not a drop of liquor to be had in the world! It is and must be a crime to sell it. Curse the day I took it, for I never, never shall be a man again!—never, never, never!"

And thus he went on for several blocks, talking all the while to himself, only interlarding his speech with here and there an oath. You would think him naturally a good-hearted fellow, and so he would be, were it not for that debasing influence of rum—that most powerful of all the demons, the blighter of many a family's happiness, the destroyer of many a human soul.

The wife all this time, was sitting at home in the "mumps." Most one o'clock, and Jasper not yet returned! but her own heart told her the reason why. There she sat by the fire, in dumb agony, while her young child slept unconscious in its crib—unconscious of its mother's grief, and of its father's erring steps. What a heavy load of misery was hers! How she doated upon that husband, and how she trembled for his safety! Each night when he was absent, she feared that some accident might have befallen him, and so harbored no thought of rest till she heard his steps upon the threshold of the door. But then her softness vanished, and pride and anger usurped the place of love.

Sometimes, however, in the lonely hours of her watch, the magic of memory carried her back to the days of her childhood and maidenhood. The image of her fond parents rose up before her—the happy days of her innocence cast their spell over her—her heart throbbed with wild emotions, and her eyes became suffused with tears. Such was her feelings on the night in question.

Jasper Hanly—him of whom we now write—was a young man of naturally excellent qualities. He was nurtured with great care by his parents, and the most correct principles were taught him. The principal fault of his early training was too much indulgence, and to this, possibly, may be traced the foundation of his present habits. At the age of fifteen, he had been put to a trade. His time was served out faithfully, at the expiration of which period, he packed all his worldly goods in a small trunk, and started for New York. Of prepossessing appearance and engaging address, he was not long in finding employment. For five whole years, Jasper was a pattern for all young men—temperate, industrious, and economical. For five long years he worked faithfully, and then he married. He married as fair and sweet a girl as ever blossomed into womanhood. She proved to Jasper a faithful wife—frugal housekeeper, neat, active and industrious. In manners she was agreeable, even unto fascination—in character she was candid even to bluntness; in temper she was quick as the steel. This latter trait brought her bitterness of heart.—You will wonder how woman can be agreeable, fascinating, blunt, and quick of temper—as qualities all comb'd; but such was the character of Mary Hanly, and but for sorrows trials, the less amiable portion of her disposition might never, or seldom have been called into requisition, as she naturally inclined to the sunny side of humanity.

For the first three years of Jasper's marriage, no husband and wife ever led a happier life.—With the exception of the loss of their first-born, nothing had, up to that time, occurred to mar their happiness. This was a sad trial for them both, but Jasper seemed to bear the loss with less patience than Mary. Little Milly was his "pet bird," as he delighted to call her, and after her death it seemed that nothing could bring him comfort—not even the presence of his wife,

Soon after this, it became apparent that he was in the frequent habit of indulging in stimulating drinks. The habit grew fast upon him, and with this fault came the association of evil and worthless companions. Mary was loath to believe her senses when for the first time she saw her husband come home intoxicated; but repetition coming upon repetition, soon opened her eyes to the fearful truth. It was a dreadful reality to her, though for weeks and months she bore it patiently and proudly, neither deigning nor condoning to notice it, though in secret she wept bitter tears. But patience at length wore out, and left the field to pride. Instead of the gentle influence that a wife should use to redeem an erring husband, she commenced to upbraid, and then—the charm was broken. Then fled from their heartstone the quiet of domestic bliss. On such occasions Jasper's own temper ran high. He could not bear the "jarring discord of a scolding woman's tongue," as he expressed himself; and often when Mary would commence to pour out upon him her vials of wrath, would he leave her with curse, and fly back to join his companions in deeper carousals.

Jasper pursued his homeward way, turning down Lisenbrand street, at the lower end of which he with difficulty mounted the steps of a house, to the door, and rang the bell. He was so weak he could hardly stand, and the short time that elapsed before his summons was answered, seemed almost an age; though Mary no sooner heard the well-known signal, than she sprang with joyous haste to let the truant in, and had you been in the room as she left it, you could not have missed hearing the involuntary but joyous exclamation, "Thank God, at last!" as it escaped from her pale and deathly lips.

They met at the door—he sick at heart and angry with confusion—she stern, and cold, and silent. Jasper felt that he had done wrong, but would not condescend to apologize with Mary in her present temper; while she—pride, and a sense of injury kept her resolute in anger. Jasper entered, staggering, and as he passed his wife to go up stairs, she half shrank from him—it is even so, though all the time she said as if she could have taken him in her arms. They passed on, up into their room, where he threw himself into an arm-chair, and she resumed her own seat by the fire. For ten or fifteen minutes sat they thus in silence, when Mary spoke:

"Don't you think, Jasper, you are getting in the habit of making good hours of late—out every night till one or two o'clock in the morning?"

Jasper heard each word distinctly spoken, but he deigned not a reply.

"Do you suppose I will submit to such treatment—sitting up all night and going without my supper, while you are out among a set of worthless companions, who only care for you so long as you spend your money?"

Jasper felt the force of this remark, though somehow or other he could not help the rising of his anger.

"If you do think so," continued Mary, "you are much mistaken. You have no reason for staying out so late, and you knew that I had not a cent of money in the house."

Jasper did know this very well, and he knew more than this; but still, though his wife had such good reason to complain, his anger increased.

"I tell you, Jasper, I will submit to such treatment no longer—I will go home to my mother first."

"Where I wish to God you had always remained!" exclaimed Jasper, unable longer to control his rage.

"No doubt of it," said Mary. "You spoke the truth then if you ever did. But you will not have me long in your way, and then you can do as you please."

"No such good luck!" exclaimed Jasper maliciously, though his own heart upbraided him for such harshness.

"Jasper, you will drive me mad with your cold, heartless sneers. Oh, why was I so big a fool as ever to get married? What woman is not better off single, than with the best man in the world?"

"What man, you might say," said Jasper, "is not ten thousand times better off, without having a woman tied round his neck, than all the married fools in creation?"

"It's a pity you got married then."

"I wish to God I had not."

"You will break my heart, you brute."

"You forgot that somebody has written that woman's heart's are not so easily broken—Yours is tough enough to stand a long while yet."

"I will leave you, and go home to my mother."

"I wish to heaven you had spirit enough to go."

"Perhaps you would like to turn me out of the house."

"Perhaps I might."

"You are not fit to be the husband of a hot-tent. You may no doubt think this all very right and proper, but I will not submit to it. You may go to-morrow among your friends where you spend your money, and see if they will give you a dinner. There is nothing in the house to eat—nothing for your child, even, whom I should think you would care about. You will feel very comfortable in the morning when you come to your senses, and hear the boy cry for food. He had better die—I wish he would. He had better die than live to see the shame of his father."

"Mary, why do you say such maddening things to me?"

"Because I choose to let you know how much I despise your filthy habits—because I wish to see you ashamed of yourself, if there is any shame left in you! Because I wish to let you know, if rum has not utterly destroyed your powers of conception, how positively contemptible is your character as a man!"

"Silence! How can you talk in that style to me? Who is the master of this house?"

"Not you, Jasper, I am sure. You are not even the master of your own senses. You need not put on your dignity to me, for I tell you once and again that I will not live with a drunkard. If you are so lost to all shame and decency, as not to know where to come home, and to spend all your time and money in low rumbolos, and among a set of worthless fellows, I will at least give you to understand that I will not submit to it. Either you must reform or we must part. That may as well be understood at once as put off to an indefinite period."

"Will you cease your infernal clack!" exclaimed Jasper, his cheeks burning with shame and rage.

"Never! While I have a voice to raise, I will not cease to reprove you for your impudent habits."

"Then you must talk to bare walls, and not to me."

CONGRESSIONAL CONVENTION.—We publish to-day, the call of the republican state central convention, for the holding of Assembly district conventions in all the districts within the second congressional district, of which Grant forms a part. So far as we know or believe, Grant will be fully represented by delegates from her assembly districts. Let there be a full convention of true men at Mineral Point, and let there be chosen a well tried man who has long been right, regardless of popular favor, and of his election no event is more certain. See that the candidate chosen is brave as well as sound, for there will be fighting to be done next congress. A brave man is never a dogface; he will fight for his principles and rights rather than give an inch. PUTNAM'S MONTHLY.—The September number of this "facile princeps" of American magazines is for sale at Sutherland's. We find it an ever fresh, lively and entertaining. Herman Melville with an improved style, continues "Israel Potter," and in a letter from one of the "strong minded," is noticeable, a quiet vein of good sense and satire, for us "lords of creation" to put in our pipes and smoke, figuratively speaking. It is truly pleasant to observe that the million are laying aside the old shilly shally (vide Benton for that word) style of monthlies, and in their place reading the scholarly and tasteful productions of our best American pens, as presented by friend Putnam. A fine portrait of the author of Swallow Barn graces the present number.
